By the opening address of the President, we had presented to us The Relation which Sanitary Science bears to National Wealth. He showed us the importance of that science to a people in its national capacity. He showed how it reaches out and touches all the springs of national greatness, power, and health; and how absolutely necessary it is to the daily and continual welfare of a people. From the rim of a circle so great, enclosing within it everything that goes to make up what we call national interests, the work of the convention rapidly and justly narrowed, the papers and discussions gathering around points that more immediately concerned us as a community. All facts, lessons, and matters properly and fairly tributary to these subjects were brought before us and made to yield us instruction concerning the proper modes...
