The several means by which it is hoped to contribute to the attainment of this object will be the publication of original researches to be carried out in physiological, pathological, chemical, and pharmaceutical laboratories in Great Britain and abroad, and the communication and diffusion of the results of the progress of chemistry as far as it relates to medical objects which has been made on fields, and communicated through channels, not commonly accessible to medical readers. In this endeavour it had to be borne in mind that some of these results might in their original form be too technical to be readily appreciated, and might therefore admit of some interpretation and adaptation to particular wants. On the other hand it was felt that the lasting value of the publication would be increased by a thoroughly practical treatment of the principal scientific questions of our time, including the communication of technical details which may be necessary to enable the reader to control, or the student and inquirer to repeat and extend, the operations of which the data furnished are the result.
